WEN-SIANG, the Grand Secretary of Chinese Imperial Council, is no more. bad long been in feeble health, and died at Peking on the 26th ultimo, at the age of fifty-seven. He has not inaptly been however, to be dropping out of the trade tormed the Nestor of the Chinese Govermment. His official career has been a responsible and laborious one. At the time East, has not sent a single ship to China of his decease, in addition to his post as Grand Secretary, he was the guiding spirit of the Yamen of Foreign Affairs. Owing to his infirmities, he has been obliged to one or two offices he formerly held, and latterly he was obliged every now and then to memorialise the Throne to be allowed to resign some of his appointments. On the 3rd February be begged to be relieved of his post on the Grand Council, in order that he might devote what little energy and time his malady would permit to Foreign Affairs. But his services on the Grand Council were considered too valuable, apparently, to be dispensed with, and his prayer was not acceded to. He was granted the _stereotyped two months congé, and was obliged to retain his post of Grand Secretary. Submissive to the Imperial will, he has accordingly died in harness. Ho has always shown a lively interest in foreign topics, and China owes much to his sagacity and discretion. He had his country's welfare at heart, and was always, we believe, a firm adherent to the peace policy. By his death the Prince of Kune has lost his most able and experienced counsellor. It is to be hoped, however, that the moderation which distinguished Wen-stand may still survive. and that his lamented death may not give the anti-foreign party at Peking any acceszion of influence. Much depends upon his successor in office. Should he be chosen by the triends of progress, a good man may be Mesers. Grand Secretary. He possesses administrative ability, is endowed with considerable powers of judgment, and is known to hold liboral and enlightened views with regard to China's foreign relations. Should old and foreign-bating party gain ascendency, there will be nothing but retrogression and constantly requiring difficulties to be looked for.

Ir is to be regretted that the want of trade statistics in this port renders the valuable "Returns of Trade" published under the auspices of the Inspector-General of Foreign for a passport. That actue gentleman de-Customs in China an imperfect statement. These returns are, generally speaking, pretty, was no use, however; and the mandarin blankly accurate, though not free from discrepancies, and make W. possible to glean a telerably fair estimate of the foreign trade done with China at the treaty ports. The abstract of trade for the past ten years before use supplies a good deal of important information, into which we propose to dive, with the object of bringing up the treaty ports, and which passed through the about 205,000,000 in 1874. This result is the more satisfactory since it includes an increase of nearly eight millions in the value annual value of the foreign trade with China for the past year is given as 136,716,176 tacks, an increase of five and a half millions ever that of the previous year, which was, however, one of much depression. A new white marble tomb was under construction, in which Alphonso told the Prince he himself would be laid some day. The King dined with the Prince at Mr. Layard's, the British Minister. All the guests were plain clother. This is a great and apprecedented innovation on Spanish quatom, so much so, indeed, that the King deemed it necessary to obtain the assent of his cabinet to the acceptance of the invitation. In returning thanks for his health, he spoke highly of England, stating in this country it was that he first wore uniform.
